Kasim Haba started up with rage, but Chu Chin Chow calmly fanned himself. A sudden interruption savel more words and ill fealing. Abdullah, who had prepared a special entertainment for the diners, announced that Marjanah, the singing sinve girl, and the dancers from the Nils would next entertain the guests.

As Marjanah sang her lyric of the sorcereas of the Nils who betrayed so many legions of anmirers and sout them to death, a young man, a new-comer to the feast, knelt and gazed upon her eagerly. He was Nur-al-Huda All, the young son of the tipay All Babs, and because of his love for Marjanah whom he haped some day

Marjanab whom he haped some day to make his wife, he was present at the feast. But Nur-al-Huda was not in favor with the minerly Kasım, in favor with the minerly Kasim, who would prafer to sell the beautiful slave girl for much gold rather than set her free to become the wife of his nephew, whom he hated.

But other eyes than those of the love-sick young man had found the fair Marjanah an attractive magnet. The Chinese membant gazed at her in admiration.
